

I totally agree with the problem of large corporations controlling the airwaves, and using those airwaves for political and financial gain. Localism is slowly slipping away- and are bombarded with one-sided opinions, mainly conservatism. Stations were originally designed for public service- not soely for large corporate financial gain and a one-sided political platform. It is more and more evident that the public has little say, if any in the broadcast sector. Yes, we can change the channel, but the message we don't want to hear is probably on a sister station, or an owned radio station or newspaper.

I never take the time to voice my opinion about issues like this- but it is important for our future and the future of America.

Sincerely,

C Raffa
